Promoting Intergenerational and Environmental Health Across the Lifespan

This innovative and participatory event will bring together leaders in science, medicine, environmental health, urban planning, smart growth, nutrition and food, education, economics, community-based advocacy, health-affected sectors, the arts and more to discuss the diverse environmental factors that influence both human and ecological health. The time is now to develop systems-based, preventive approaches to address these factors – including the built, chemical, food, natural, social and economic environments – and improve health across the lifespan.

PLEASE JOIN US in creating and implementing new models that will benefit the health of current and future generations.
